Understanding the concept is important: Never Cramp

Cramming involves attempting to cram all of the information required for your exam into your memory in a very short period of time, and it doesn't work very well. It doesn't work well because our memory works best when we focus on one concept at a time and spend time linking the concept to what we already know.

Your brain also needs time to rest. Your brain and memory can only accept so much at any one time, in the same way that you cannot keep lifting a heavy weight indefinitely, you need to rest your muscles. Your brain needs time to rest before it's ready to accept more information. Cramming does not allow time for this rest to occur.

In addition to not being able to easily recall the information you need in the exam, cramming can also cause stress, memory fatigue, and affect your ability to concentrate. This makes it even more difficult to recall the information in your exam. And if that wasn't bad enough, you are also more likely to forget (or be unable to retrieve) later, any information that you did manage to recall in the exam. This may be a problem for you in future subjects that build on the information you are learning now. You may be required to spend time re-learning the information later when you are trying to complete future subjects. You are also likely to need to draw on this knowledge in your future career.

While our advice is to avoid cramming, we know that there are times when you may find you only have a short period of time to prepare for your exams. You can adapt the strategies listed above to maximise the effectiveness of the study time you have available. Allocate time to all of your subjects and use a mini interleaving approach where you alternate your study time across multiple subjects. Taking breaks while you are studying will help you to maintain your concentration during your study block.

Overall enjoy the process of learning and focus on what we would be achieving. Graining knowledge is the biggest reward. Best of luck to all for upcoming exams.
